Founded in 1993, Sear Bliss from Hungary release their eighth full-length album now. "Letters From The Edge" will be published on August 24 via Hammerheart Records and it will be available on CD as well as on vinyl.

The album starts with an atmospheric intro, which turns into the first song "Forbidden Doors" after a minute. Powerful riffs, hymnic solos and nagging vocals by András Nagy, who is also responsible for bass and keyboard, are supplemented with rhythm and tempo changes, which provide the necessary variety.

My personal favorite "Seven Springs" shows wonderful sound elements. At times it seems dreamy and playful, until it gets down to black metal again, where the shooting gallery rumbles and the ax fraction hits the strings.

Catchy tune passages mingle with classic Black Metal components, which are decisively influenced by the striking sound of the trombone and give the black frenzy the necessary dynamism and energy. The interaction of the instruments harmonizes here particularly impressively.

"Haven" surprised me, as the first riffs strongly reminded me of the German band Thormesis. However, that changed in the course of the song. After about fifty minutes, the last notes of "Shroud" fade away and mark the end of this musical journey.

Conclusion:

Sear Bliss shine on this disc with atmospheric melodies and typical sound elements. A very worthwhile prank, but it misses one or another highlight.

Rating: 7,5/10
