Kattah from Brazil will release their second CD "Lapis Lazuli" in the end of october. I have to admit the CD needs several runs before one takes to it. That doesn't imply something negative, on the contrary, "Lapis Lazuli" doesn't spark right away but afterwards you have a lot more fun with the disc then you expected.

The musicians don't fear to connect arabic elements with heavy metal, which I like a lot. The mixture is brave but it's exactly for my liking. Now and then one sifts out popular bands such as Edguy for example.

But mainly I hear Bruce Dickinson; Roni Sauaf sounds partly exactly like him. The guy affixes the songs a stamp in the best manner of frontmen. The voice matches the music to 100 percent. He sings emotional and quiet as well as very powerful and dynamic.

Victor Brochard on the guitar is also a pretty great string-magician and is another advantage for the Brazilians. Mister Brochard understands to use his hatchet in a way that makes you understand he does it out of passion. Each tone and each riffs radiates magic which cannot be taught, it gotta come out of the inside! His solos are absolutely supporting the songs and they're perfectly attuned. Every note is exactly where it should be. Hopefully one will hear a lot from this man in the future.

Christian Alex on the drums and Cicero Chagas on the bass should be mentioned too. Without the solid work on their instruments , the mentioned magic in the songs wouldn't work.

Conclusion:

Arabic elements merched with heavy metal, this is great but brave. The CD needs several runs before one takes to it but then there's much to discover. Take your time and you'll have a disc of a Brazil band which will bring you a lot of fun. The band is not responsible for the bad information material, but it should be mentioned. There's not much information to get about the band in the leaflet.
